Business Leader and Philanthropist Tom Steyer joins key Asian American groups to grow the power of Asian American Voters

On National Voter Registration Day, Asian American leaders highlight key economic, health and environmental issues facing voters in Oakland Chinatown

OAKLAND, Calif. – The Asian Pacific Environmental Network (APEN) and NextGen Climate America today announced a major partnership aimed at registering and engaging voters in the Asian American community, one of the fastest growing ethnic groups in California. The partnership, part of a statewide coalition headed by NextGen Climate America, was announced at a voter registration rally in Oakland's Chinatown on National Voter Registration Day.

"Low-income API immigrants and refugees in Oakland, Richmond and across California have long endured the cumulative impacts of housing insecurity, pollution and climate change," said Miya Yoshitani, Executive Director of APEN. "Now, we are a growing political force in the state, and we are voting to advance solutions in our neighborhoods, like clean air, renter protections and a democracy that works for all of California."

"We know our democracy is strongest when the most people participate and when every community has a voice," said Tom Steyer, NextGen Climate America President. "We're excited to be working with APEN to turn out and engage the Asian American community. On National Voter Registration Day, it's essential we reach every Californian and ensure their voice, and their vote, is heard in November."

Thanks to the partnership, APEN will be hiring dozens of paid organizers and recruiting volunteers to canvass and telephone tens of thousands of voters throughout Oakland, the East Bay and across the state. They will engage in registration efforts on seven college campuses, including UC Berkeley, Alameda Community College and Contra Costa Community College.

Long-time voter outreach worker for APEN and newly naturalized citizen, Linna Lin, shared her experience voting in this election. "I became a citizen just a few months ago, and this election will be the first election I am voting in. This is important to me because I want to use my voice to encourage others in my community to do so too. Voting is an obligation, and it is our right to exercise our voice,” said Lin.

Additionally, Asian Health Services – a community health center that plays an integral role in promoting both health and advocacy for the Asian immigrant and refugee community in the East Bay – has supported many residents in voter registration and education.

“We believe that our measure of success is not about how many patients we see, but how many are empowered to assert their right to health and well-being,” said Sherry Hirota, CEO of Asian Health Services. “We want our community to exercise their right to vote, in order to steer the direction of this great nation.”

NextGen Climate America, headed by Steyer, is partnering with 67 organizations in over 30 counties in an effort to carry out the largest voter registration drive in state history.
